This new textbook on international commercial arbitration, explores the process from inception in the contractual drafting stage, through the mechanics of the dispute resolution process, to the enforcement stage, with some consideration of other alternative dispute resolution techniques. The original case studies and related materials are largely drawn from actual practice. The materials are designed to equip a new generation for the tasks of cross-border dispute resolution. They are as useful for teaching future corporate attorneys who will be drafting contracts and managing disputes, to the aspiring advocates who will handle the fights. The materials explore not only the theoretical foundations of the private dispute resolution process and applicable law, but also offer dozens of case studies. Each of those studies serves to promote informed student development of practical skills applied in lessons from real world problems. The materials are particularly user-friendly to adjunct professors who also practice in the field a perfect blend of theory and practice for today's student and teacher alike.
